A British hostage was killed by his captors in Nigeria yesterday when a UK Special Forces rescue operation ended in tragedy.

Chris McManus was executed by gunmen as members of the Special Boat Service and Nigerian soldiers moved in on the Al Qaeda-inspired terrorists' hideaway.

Fellow hostage, Italian Franco Lamolinara, was also killed. The pair had been held for ten months.

British hostage: Christopher McManus was killed by his captors yesterday as troops moved in to rescue him amid fears his life was in 'imminent and growing danger'

Fears for Mr McManus's welfare had intensified following the release of a video in August showing the 28-year-old engineer blindfolded alongside three armed men.

One of the terrorists said it would be the 'last message' to David Cameron about the hostage.

Yesterday the Prime Minister broke the news of the execution to Mr McManus's family in a personal phone call before making a public statement in which he appeared emotional.

It is the second time he has ordered a hostage rescue mission that has failed. Scottish aid worker Linda Norgrove died when Special Forces tried to rescue her from the Taliban in Afghanistan.

Mr Cameron had also telephoned his Italian counterpart Mario Monti to tell him of the failed operation – but last night there was growing anger in Italy as it became clear that Rome was informed of the raid to free the hostages only once it had got underway.

Further details of the rescue bid were emerging last night, but it remained unknown whether Mr McManus and Mr Lamolinara – a 48-year-old father of two – died before or during the operation.

There were reports the men may have been held in a house in Sokoto, a city in Nigeria's north-west.

One witness said: 'The security agencies tried to break into the house but there was resistance. The people inside the house were shooting at them and they returned fire.'

KIDNAPPERS' LINKS TO AL QAEDA

FOREIGN workers in Nigeria have faced the daily threat of kidnap for decades.

Scores of expat workers – mainly in the oil industry – have been seized by gangsters in the south-west of the country.

In most cases they are released after payment of a ransom by the companies that operate there. At least 24 Britons and 200 other foreign nationals have been seized in the area since 2007.

Kidnapping, however, is uncommon in the predominantly Muslim north, hence the alarm when Chris McManus was abducted last May.

Fears were raised further when security services realised the kidnappers were not after a ransom. Instead they released a video of the engineer kneeling in front of gunmen and urging the Government to 'meet the demands of Al Qaeda'.

The identity of the captors was unclear yesterday but chief suspects are the terror group's African branch, Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, or militant Islamist group Boko Haram.

Another Al Qaeda-affiliated group, known as 'Al Qaeda in the land beyond the Sahel', claimed in December that it had captured Mr McManus.

Boko Haram, whose name means 'Western education is sacrilege' has been demanding the imposition of Sharia law in Nigeria.

It once specialised in robbing banks but lately it has carried out a series of devastating bombings. On Christmas Day it attacked a church killing at least 40 people. Last August, 20 died when it carried out a suicide attack on the UN headquarters in Abuja.

The Islamic Maghreb group has kidnapped several Westerners in recent years but most have been freed, often after payments of large ransoms.

None of the 20 strong British rescue force was injured and Nigerian president Goodluck Jonathan said all the terrorists had been arrested.

The rescue was triggered when – after months of searching – the SBS found the heavily protected location where the men were being held.

Mr Cameron said authorities had decided to go ahead with the rescue after receiving 'credible information about [the men's] location'.

'A window of opportunity arose to secure their release. We also had reason to believe that their lives were under imminent and growing danger,' he insisted.

The Prime Minister said it was 'with great regret' that he had to announce Mr McManus, from Oldham, and Mr Lamolinara had lost their lives in the subsequent operation.

'I am very sorry that this ended so tragically,' he stressed, adding: 'Terrorism and appalling crimes such as these are a scourge on our world. No one should be in any doubt about our determination to fight and to defeat them.'

Mr McManus, a contract worker for an Italian construction company, was kidnapped by gunmen in May last year after they stormed his apartment in Birnin-Kebbi in the north-west of Nigeria.

Mr Lamolinara, a 48-year-old father of two of Gattinara near Turin, was also taken. A German colleague escaped by scaling a wall despite being shot and injured.

Last night Mr McManus's parents, two brothers and sister issued a statement thanking all involved in the attempted rescue.

It said: 'We are of course devastated by the news of Chris's death, which we received earlier today.'

Members of the Special Boat Service, pictured here on a training exercise, were sent in to the kidnappers' hideout to try and rescue the two hostages

'During this ordeal we have relied heavily on the support of our family and friends which has never waned and has enabled us to get through the most difficult of times.

'We are also aware of the many people who were working to try and have Chris returned to our family, and his girlfriend. We would like to thank all of them for their efforts.'

The family said they were confident 'everything that could be done was being done' during their ten-month ordeal and sent their condolences to relatives of the other dead hostage.'

The kidnapped men had been working on building a bank in the city, the capital of the lawless Kebbi province.

In August a Nigerian group calling itself 'Al Qaeda in the land beyond the Sahel' claimed responsibility for the kidnap and released the video showing Mr McManus, in a Manchester United shirt, with three men armed with Kalashnikov rifles and a machete.

He pleaded for the British Government to answer the demands of the group to save his life. One of the kidnappers then said the British Government had failed to answer its demands and it was given two weeks to 'take the correct decision'.

Yesterday, security officials said they believed the kidnappers were from a splinter group of the Islamist militant group Boko Haram, which has links to Al Qaeda.

Sources said Ministry of Defence officials approached Mr Cameron on Wednesday evening and made it clear they believed there was a 'time-limited opportunity' to mount an attempt to free the men.

The Prime Minister took the decision to go ahead and then followed the operation 'in real time' yesterday morning. A meeting of the Government's emergency committee Cobra was convened, but word came back that the two men had been killed by their captors.

The Italian prime minister's office said that it had been 'constantly in touch with British authorities but that the operation had got underway with the Nigerians and British forces with Italy informed once it had begun'.

Former Italian prime minister Massimo D'Alema said: 'I want full light to be shed on why Italy was only informed once the operation had started.'

Sad incident indeed. Whatever the reasons the so called "elite" forces failed miserably, what SF operations happens at 11 AM? And all those saying killing OBL was easy and nothing like this- firstly flying into a country with (relatively) advanced radars and SAMs and semi-competent ground forces and being undetected is much more impressive than conducting a mission in Nigeria where the most deadly weapon you'd oppose was an AK47 of RPG. Also does no one remember the case of SEAL team 6 (conducting an almost IDENTICAL mission profile) a few months back rescuing a US women and Dutch man? They parachuted in at night, killed all the hostage takers and freed the hostages and got out all safe within 20 minutes. These sort of disasters happen when you play at special operations, there is no way the UK comes even near the special ops capabilities of the US. DC should have just phoned up his "mate" Obama and asked him to take care of it, that way we wouldn't be saying RIP.

Multinationals and expatriates have to carefully conduct a risk assessment before venturing in to such terrain in Nigeria. I lived in that part of Nigeria for brief period of 12 months in 1998. It's a very complex region with Islamic fundamentalist ruling the area. The reason it took so long to locate them was the vast desert landscape it's like seeking for a needle in a haystack. I would recommend nonnegotiation with them should we have such occurrence again. They are backward criminals with no set of rules and my condolence to the family of the two victims. The Nigerian

If I was ever kidnapped I would want the person in charge of dealing with the situation to have the guts to go for a rescue mission with very clear orders that if the hostages were killed the rescue order would become an execute order. If you pay hostage takers it just encourages more - the only way to beat them is to teach them that it doesn't pay and will cost them their lives.

I honestly hadn't heard about this until yesterday. Kidnapping has to be amongst the most evil of crimes - I can't imagine the months of stagnating hope those poor men went through only to be killed at the end of it. Absolutely gutting. Also, I'm going to wildly speculate and say that as the article states no special forces injuries or abductor deaths suggests it likely that they weren't killed in a firefight but possibly before. In any event, I hope the men captured receive the full force of the law even if it's death. Nigerians are a fantastic people with a country of huge potential and they don't need this. Fundamentalism of any kind is a wickedness and a scourge that infects Africa along with disease and corruption and all three require focused and full eradication. R.I.P. My sincerest condolences to both families.

Many of the critical comments here directed, at those attempting the rescue are simply crass. Those making them are not aware of the operational facts. RIP to the innocent victims and condolences to both families and friends. – Once again however David Cameron has demonstrated his increasingly undiplomatic and arrogant side and has upset one of our allies, the Italians. Just imagine the reaction if the boat had been on the other foot and the Italians had attempted a rescue without keeping the UK government in the loop.

See the let's send Shirley Williams along to negotiate with them commentators are continuing their idyllic lives in fairyl and.

Between 1999 and 2003 nine Nigerian states adopted sharia law, change in haste, regret in leisure. - Leew, lancashire, 9/3/2012 9:38=====Nigeria as a whole didn't opt for this. Northern Muslims who want to live under Sharia Law did. A partition is the only option I can think of.

All you Americans making nasty comments, you need to get a grip such a stupid mentality no wonder your country is in such a mess and the rest of the world can't stand you.- SLP, London, 9/3/2012 1:58>>>>>>>>> Three, SLP; three "Americans" made snide comments. Additionally, one comment seemed very much more of a point that if this were to have been the SEALs, you lot would be on this like white-on-rice, slagging off the Americans; however, none of you will admit that. I am certain no one (aside from the families) feels worse about this outcome than the men on this mission. I imagine the point that the non-trolls were trying to make is that no matter the country, these forces are elite, but not every mission has a perfect outcome. Just wait though... upon reading about the next failed American mission, your Anglo-Saxon eyes light up, and immediately you will start typing away about the inherent inferiority of the Yanks.

Why on earth did they use SBS instead of the SAS, given that these hostages were being held in northern Nigeria which is completely landlocked??? What efforts were made to secure the release of the hostages prior to this rescue mission??? Were these kidnappers definitely Nigerian??? ► Drew Barrymore's zombie comedy Santa Clarita Diet gets the axe at Netflix following its third season

TOWIE SPOILER: First look at Amber Turner's SHOCK return as she engages in heated chat

why the SBS were involved and not the SAS, just because it was a land based operation. If this was the case, it didnt happen in the air either so the SAS were not the right either?!! Both SBS & SBS are trained to carry out land based operations. Why are the Royal Marines and SBS in Afghanistan (Landlocked). As for killing of the 2 men before resucue, when you are forced to involve the Nigeria army, a country who's national sport is corruption and backhanders there is little surprise that the captors were given the tip off in return for info for a bung.
