I remember one time, not long ago in Mauritania, after we finished praying with Abu Hafs Al-Mauritani, I left afterwards to the market with a friend of mine, and spent thirty mins haggling in Arabic with a guy selling trinkets. He wanted to charge extra to engrave my name on one

I had told my friend about my unique problem with Arabic. I speak fus-ha of the Qur'ân and struggle with modern terms and structure, and i understand some Libyan(at the time i could speak Libi still), but i struggle with accents. Egyptian, Lebanese, and Palestinian especially.

Weirdly, i can get along with Maghribi/Jaza'iri accents easy, but i get along best with Khaleejis. Anyways, my friend was surprised that i was haggling for thirty mins with the seller flawlessly with the seller. Despite my earlier self deprecation.

We finished buying from the seller (I got him to do the engravings for my and family trinkets for free, he would call a price and i would simply say "sounds good but no, you already killed me in the pricing for buying the trinkets")

On our way from the market, we ran into Sheikh Mazeed(big Salafi scholar in Mauritania), he had liked my impromptu talk i gave at an event earlier in English(translated to Arabic) , and so began to talk to me in Arabic about points i raised, and i began to reply also in Arabic.

Immediately i began to speak, he stopped me and said "your Arabic is very good, your pronunciation is excellent, but you had your outburst in English, why??". I tried to be real and say "I don't know much Arabic, I just did some studying ", but he was having none of that

And so i explained, at that time I only thought in English (now it's more complex, I think in multiple languages in a weird mix) and so when i needed to impromptu express myself, i could only muster English to do that.

Recently, i was having a conversation on phone with someone (an Arab),whom i had previously told i only know a wee teeny bit of Arabic, while someone else was present who doesn't know any Arabic. So i kept switching effortlessly between Arabic and English during the conversation

Using English when we were talking just general stuff, and Arabic when the conversation slipped into more serious things. My friend was surprised/shocked because he didn't know i could speak more than a sentence of Arabic (as i had told him my Arabic is Qulail/very little)

And so he kept screaming into the phone "You bloody manipulator! How the hell you tell me all this while your Arabic is very small, and you actually can speak good fus-ha! You are mad. I tell you!" He was mighty pissed. Cursed my mother's Qus' in his rage.

But then i thought about it, and i realised that i am actually now able to express myself impromptu in Qur'aanic Fus-ha Arabic. Not those darijaatic takes on Fus-ha people speak and modern schools teach, or the various gharghaliyaat and 'Awwamiyaat. Don't care for those

My issue with how i speak not just Arabic but any language including English(to a lesser extent) is that i am very pedantic with the rules. Extremely so. When i speak, i am thinking over my words ensuring i am voicing them out in the correct order and correct manner.

Listening to the newscasters on AJ Arabic or BBC Arabic or Al-Akhbar grates on the very depths of my soul. Worse is going to Jumuah and the Imam is speaking Arabic like it is a dialect of Hausa or Yoruba or Bengali or Pashto. Please no no no.

Like, i used to travel from wherever to make sure i could go to Jumuah in Kaduna, at Musabaqah, just to be able to listen and enjoy the khutbah. And if you are doing jihad and your videos is riddled with speakers giving speeched in poor Arabic, i will pray against you please

I cannot be watching your videos to understand what you are fighting for and be left wondering if you just pronounced ع or ا or ا or ا if you meant to say علم (he taught) or الم (he inflicted pain). Brah which is it?
